

why PUYALLUP CHOCOLATES

Premium Chocolate.
Authentic Partnership.
Powerful Impact.

Camp Fire is a national youth development organization that connects young people to the outdoors, to others, and to themselves.

Puyallup Chocolates is owned by the Puyallup Tribe of Indians, a federally recognized Coast Salish tribe based in the Tacoma, WA region.

Together, we are investing in the next generation.

About the Partnership:

This collaboration is built on a shared commitment to:

- Youth empowerment through skill-building and confidence
- Sustainable futures looking seven generations ahead
- Community prosperity that lifts everyone
- Authentic values reflected in every decision

What Young People Gain:

When Camp Fire youth sell Puyallup Chocolates, they not only earn funds to attend life-changing camp experiences and year-round programs, but also develop real-world skills:

- Financial literacy and money management
- Goal setting and strategic thinking
- Public speaking and communication
- Entrepreneurship and self-determination
- Community connection and purpose

"This collaboration will fund programs to equip young people with financial confidence, leadership skills, and cultural grounding in one comprehensive experience."

— Matt Wadhvani, CEO, Puyallup Tribal Enterprises & CFO,
Puyallup Tribe of Indians

Addressing Cultural Appropriation & Repairing Harm

For over a century, Camp Fire's mission has been to provide a safe place where kids come together to learn, grow, and build connections. But like many legacy organizations, our past also includes a history of harm—specifically, the cultural appropriation of Native American traditions, symbols, and stories. This history has caused pain and perpetuated stereotypes that we are committed to addressing and repairing.

Since 2019, Camp Fire has worked to moving beyond harmful practices and building reciprocal relationships with Native and Indigenous communities. This partnership is one important step on that journey. Visit campfire.org/blog to learn more.
